STUDENTS CORNER

Four travel trends which will drive the travel and tourism industry in 2018

The more you wonder, the more you wander – hadn't this been for real, the majority of the population on earth would not have constituted of gallivanterers. Boundaries and borders have never restricted the adventurers from travelling and exploring the different corners of the world. The US, UK, France, Spain and China have always been the prime choices of travellers. However, the trends in travel and tourism are changing in sync with the changing role of travellers into adventurers. One is no more merely a traveller who enjoys the beauty of a stunning landscape; instead, he/she is the new-age adventurer who dives straight into the depth of an ocean or becomes a part of the dense forest located in remote areas of Africa to feel the thrill.

Therefore, the popularity of experiential travel destinations is increasing if compared to the traditional vacation destinations.

Apart from the volatile nature of travellers-cum-adventurers trying new exotic destinations every time, there are many factors that resulted in the evolving trends in the tourism and travel industry.

Energy efficiency in the hotel industry- Need of the hour

A growing population is putting more pressure on mother Earth's finite resources and hence sustainable usage of scarce resources is need of the hour. Sustainability is all about finding ways of providing natural resources that will last for future generations and have less impact on the environment. In this context, energy efficiency becomes the foremost point of consideration for everyone and more for the hospitality sector as they are not only on the forefront of inculcating the idea of energy saving and efficiency to the masses but also to practice it for sustainable growth in the business. For example, optimised heating, ventilation and airconditioning alone can lower energy consumption by more than 40% - without compromising the convenience of the guest.

In hospitality, one can think of three broad pillars for energy efficiency and sustainability. First is food, second is water, and third is the most obvious aspect of energy production and utilisation.

Burgeoning wildlife tourism

Wildlife tourism is growing continually, almost in tandem with the rising scarcity of wild tigers, gorillas, and other species. Lately, it has been noticed that people are opting for safari trips to see the remaining habitats of endangered or extinct species. The scarcity, in such a case, triggers the rise of wildlife tourism's economic value. Surveys have confirmed that wildlife watching is an important segment of African tourism, with over 80 percent sales of the total annual global trips comprising of African trips. Over the last two years, adventure trips to Africa increased up to 17 percent, where wildlife safaris have seen a steep rise of 22 percent in East and South Africa.

However, trips to places like Kenya and Egypt have dropped due to insecure and unsafe wildlife safaris in risk-zoned areas. But now, safety comes guaranteed with the holiday packages – good news for the intrepid traveller.

Choosing the destination less travelled to

People are setting their eyes on areas or countries that are less travelled to as these are, often, the refugees of birds and animals living in harmony with nature. Dominica receives about 73,000 tourists, Tonga around 45,000, and Bhutan 37,000 – every year. Lack of tourist facilities, visa complexities, alienated locations, and tight budgets might be a few reasons why such places are not travelled to by visitors frequently. However, Kenya, Rwanda, Arizona, and Nepal are trending hot-spots on the list for travel enthusiasts to explore. In fact, Nepal and Rwanda are listed among the top 12 popular destinations, as per ABTA's report on travel trends.

The wildlife safari in Tanzania, Mount Kilimanjaro climbing, gorilla tracking in Uganda, beautiful road trips in Arizona, and bungee jumping in Pokhara are attracting gallivanter from all over the world.
